And Lapse Brought Zoo Worker Pretty Near His End.

Sailor Tells of Time He Was Forced to Stand Off Grizzly With His Bare Hands, and No Chance for Footwork.

"A person can get used to most anythin'," observed a huge, grizzled man with two livid sears half an inch apart on his face, from the right eyebrow clear across his nose to the left corner of his jaw. He was in sailor uniform, and was standing in the street with the crowd watching a double-jointed acrobat, who had just wriggled from a strait Jacket, hanging head down three stories above the asphalt. "But it's playing with fire always," he added reflectively, "and some day you may forget. But the fire won't."

He stroked his sears with an apologetic finger as he continued: "Before I enlisted I worked in a zoo. I didn't have to train 'em. No; mine was the heavy work, feedin' 'em and cleanin' out the cages. Trainin' 'em, to them as if they were no better than you can always have a whip or a revolver handy, but when you're cleanin' a cage you haven't anythin' but a shovel or a pitchfork; and, doin' that kind of work, you sort of forget they're wild bensts, anyway. They seem more like cows or horses or any other civilized animals. I was so big and husky I sometimes went in with nothin' but my bare hands; but I was always takin a chance. I was pretty careful, though, when I went thto old Zeke's rage. Zeke was a cross-grained old grizzly. When I didn't have my pitchfork, I generally aimed to have a wrench or a piece of gas pipe handy. But one day I forgot.

"Zeke somehow got the door open between him and two young grizzlies, and I had to get him back again. I shouldn't have gone in without a club; but it was about quittin' time at noon, life to merchandising. and I was in a hurry. I jumped into he cage mad enough to scratch his yes out with my bare hands.

"tiet out of here." I yelled, wavin' my arms in his face.

"He only growled at me; but the other two bears, in a panie, holted into the other compartment. I decided where he was and let the other bears have his den. I slammed the deer shut between, and started toward the manhole through which I had entered. But old Zeke got up on his toes when he saw I had shut him out of his own quarters and away from his playmates; and, favin' his ears back and quentin' his mouth until he gaped like-

"I didn't have time to reach the door. Lettin' out a yell for help, I shool my ground. Old Zeke came at me with though: I gave him a right and left in the rite and designed; but before I Pittsburgh, Pa.-"For many months rights inv shirt off to my waist. I minumized to get in another late

GHOST STORIES VARY LITTLE

Invariably Only Two Elements at the Base of Japanese Tales of the Supernatural.

The elements at the base of the ghost story of Japanese thought are simple. They are fear and anger, two emotions not separable, the one implying the other and forming a single motive-a fact perhaps true throughout the rule of the exercise of these two passions. . . They deal with men and women, and are complete novels of everyday life. Of the past, there is the carefully preserved traditional treatment, as accurate as the delightful reproduction of old-time costumes and old-time life found in the long line of artists of the brush, whether in painting or literature.

But this is a trait of the race, so eminently given to minute detail in featuring its environment. Its prejudices are instanced in the great importance and strict injunction as to observance and practice of long-time custom, in the ready reference of divers fills to old superstitions always uppermost in the popular mind, some widely spread others severely local.

With all the varied detail and confusion of plot, the stories are all cast in the same rigid lines. In general terms -one read, all have been read. This can be attributed to the essential sameness found throughout Japanese social life. The ghost itself is to be mentioned.
